Share this: Like this: More than just plants, many of us have "favorite" foods that just seem to make us happy. In 2012, a study of people across the world found that people from 65 different countries could predict the food preferences of almost half of their countrymen! Their "food cravings" were easy to spot: even if we were not near any actual foods, we could tell what people liked based on their profile. For example, North Americans favor sweet and savory food. Italians prefer pasta. Asians prefer seafood. It's no surprise that different cultures have their own unique culinary preferences. What is more interesting to me is that people share some of their favorite foods across cultures. People from Japan like chocolate and coffee, and all of us can agree that these are delicious. And, in fact, you'll find them to be delicious to all cultures. The study's authors think of food preferences as a culture-specific "symbolic meaning system" of our society. That is, these are the shared symbols and meanings that we use to interpret and understand the world. For example, a turtle might be a symbol of peace in Japan, but can also represent a hard day of work! Science agrees that we all share the same basic biological needs, but has no problems with explaining why those needs differ from culture to culture. A better understanding of culture-specific symbols and meanings will open up possibilities for individuals to find solutions to our shared problems. The field of communications studies is huge, but it is not easy to understand how things like advertising or music marketing is related to our everyday lives. As a graduate student, I have found my research in this field to be incredibly rewarding, but I also find myself wondering why a lot of this research isn't written more clearly. The demand for certain expertise is rising, and more students are entering
