Feature-based attention influences perceptual completion. Recent research has shown that perceptual completion can influence object perception in feature-based attentional selection tasks. Here, we tested how perceptual completion influences object perception in feature-based attentional selection tasks. Observers were cued to look for an object defined by one feature dimension, which could be defined by either a global form (shape) or a local feature (orientation). We varied the number of objects in display, which was either similar to the number of objects in the cue, or much smaller. With feature-based attention, observers show attentional cueing effects, where reaction times in the probe task decrease with increasing display size. When attention is controlled for, these cueing effects are reduced, and show a new pattern: When there is one object in display, reaction times are reduced at the cued location, but increased at the uncued location. These findings suggest that even with feature-based attention, observers continue to use perceptual completion.
America's First Family is getting in on the act. Michelle Obama is breaking her silence on the issue of President Donald Trump's recent comments about women and is urging everyone to "rise above the noise" of the political back-and-forth. "When a woman is paid less than a man for the same work, it's a problem," Obama wrote in a post on Instagram. "When women are paid less than men for the same work, it's a problem. When a mom's pay isn't enough to cover the cost of childcare, it's a problem. When a dad who is a great parent can't take a few minutes off to see his kids, it's a problem. When a woman is fired from her job, or can't afford to pay the bills, or just feels invisible, it's a problem." The president and first lady make a point to discuss the many issues that impact the American family and how we can work together to help improve the lives of women and children. "We have to be better than this," she continued. "Rise above the noise. Show up. Be counted. Be someone who matters. Because kids deserve better.
