about them. I'm not sure I can recall an organism in our household that has so many challenges as an HSP. First, they go through heat and cold (too) easily and are prone to sickness in our perpetually cold environment. Also, they seem to view the years of sickness that come at such times as being simply a part of life and so seems to ignore that they are much more prone to catching things that other people don't. Such as the flu and then it becomes something else. One thing I was able to get away with was the cold, which really affected me much less. Thankfully, I have the skills to do well at home under these conditions, which gives me some useful respite from the suffocating laundry. So, off to work I went, despite a decidedly less than pleasant day last week. The second illness, at least as far as any illness has been with me, was an ear infection, which started on Sunday night and has not completely cleared up. I can confirm that the antibiotics are helping, but not completely eliminating it. Partly this is because I'm in the workgroup, and so there's a risk of it coming back from a different source if I'm at work, and partly because I'm a HSP and this is so easily spread. That is, I'm prone to getting two infections at once, and since I don't have enough time to rest between illnesses, that's two weeks of time wasted between getting sick. I'm also exposed, since I'm teaching, and this sort of thing happens a lot in the workgroup. It means my husband has to nurse me through several days of illness, when before I was on the other end of it. This was the closest week that we've gotten to light duty work, since I've been home sick. We did the
