The analysis of trace elements in biological fluids by ICP-MS is one of the most important tools for the diagnosis of pathological disorders. The application of ICP-MS to clinical and toxicological studies in recent years has emphasized the importance of minimizing analytical errors in the determination of trace elements in biological matrices. The contamination of the chemical and instrumental sources of the ICP-MS detector is the principal source of uncertainty in the determination of trace elements by ICP-MS. Pulsed ultrafiltration (PUF) has been used to remove salts, proteins and hydrophobic substances from serum, leading to clear and concentrated samples for analysis. In this study, we compare results obtained by ICP-MS in a conventional approach to analyzing undiluted serum with those obtained using PUF-ICP-MS. A total of 135 serum samples were analyzed in both modes of analysis. Concentrations of Cd, Cu, Hg, Ni, Pb, Sr and Zn were obtained by PUF-ICP-MS using a PVA filter (VoluCell, 30 kDa cutoff) as the membrane. Cd, 2d92ce491b
