I'm just curious...when you watch the promo for this season of So You Think You Can Dance (which is coming up on an hour in the day after my piano lesson), what do you think of the way they've cast the season? (I figure you either love it or hate it.) I'd like to know what you think as well. Personally, I think I like the line-up...BEST so far. I think it's good because they're doing what they've always done: putting together a cast of dancers who have nothing in common - who are a mix of ages and genders and ethnicities and levels of experience and talent - and who are, by and large, all kind of spectacular. In the past, you'd often see a group of dancers who shared a common physical attribute: youth, slenderness, white skin, beautiful hair, etc. They'd be young and gorgeous and I think that's all that was expected from the dancers on the show. Well, these are all good things and I like them. However, they're also all things that people already do in the real world. They already have their looks. They're naturally talented. They're naturally graceful. They're naturally beautiful. They're not a bunch of dancers who got into it purely because they wanted to be on TV and then got the chance. They don't come from backgrounds where the only reason they got into dancing was because there was no one else at their school to dance with. They aren't dancers who want to do it to make a name for themselves. I just think it's important to emphasize that So You Think You Can Dance is really about the dance itself - the art of dance - and not about these other aspects. The dancers are extraordinary. There's no question about that. What I'm concerned about is that they're spectacular in a way that no one's ever really been spectacular before. These dancers have enormous potential. But they also have experience. They all have a lot of experience. And most importantly, they all have something to bring to the table that other people don't: they have personality. In the past, every season of So You Think You Can Dance was essentially about the same thing: pretty people 2d92ce491b
