Mechanisms of hyaluronic acid penetration into the brain: implications for experimental cancer research. Our previous work has demonstrated that hyaluronic acid (HA) is rapidly taken up by brain tissue and that this accumulation can be inhibited by heparan sulphate (HS) and by reducing the molecular weight of the molecule. In the present work, we show that the mechanism of HA uptake in the brain is saturable, reversible and energy-independent. We also show that the uptake of this molecule is inhibited by pre-treatment of the tissue with HS. The data presented also support the idea that in the brain HA accumulates as a result of opsonisation by macrophages, which we propose is mediated by the
