Download kannada sex stories in pdf format. A woman in the city of Vellore in the southern Indian state of Tamil Nadu sent her husband's laptop to a remote computer engineer in the northern state of Karnataka. The computer, which was locked when she turned it on, had its hard drive seized by the police who suspected it to contain pornography. In a court of law, the woman, not named for privacy reasons, has alleged that her husband, a lecturer at the Regional Engineering College in Vellore, had illicit sex with some college girls. The laptop, she has argued, was the means to carry on such relationships and had only been used for showing her husband 'dirty' things on his computer. She has further stated that he had told her that the laptop contained pictures of him having sex with two college girls. The man has told the court that the woman had been asking for divorce since their marriage in 1998, while she has denied all allegations. The court has also heard that the woman has been unfaithful to her husband for the past eight years and that their marriage is living apart since 2004, while the man is still a lecturer at the Regional Engineering College. He had introduced her to one of the college girls he had been having sex with, with whom he had also been in a relationship, the court has been told. The marriage between the couple is being dissolved by the Family Court of Vellore under Section 13(3) of the Hindu Marriage Act, which states that a marriage may be dissolved by the court if it is proved that one of the parties has committed adultery, and if this is caused to the other.
