You can use it to create a space for people to comment on content, track community discussion and comment, and even allow people to ask follow-up questions as they read articles and other content. In a public space, you'll be able to comment on content you have access to, or if you're a user with moderator privileges you can create a private space where people can comment on content that is stored on Google Drive or provided by other Google products, such as Blogger and Google+. You can add links, pictures, videos, or any other media into a discussion or question. You can share your data with others, so they can see and comment on it, or you can share the discussion data with people. You can also use Moderator to add collaborative annotations to content. Annotations are similar to notes in Google Docs, and are easier to integrate into your workflow. Annotations can be embedded into the content and can display as plain text, rich text, HTML, or images. You'll be able to add a mark to content in Moderator that tells readers whether you agree or disagree, and you can ask other people to comment on your comments. To add a mark to content, just click the "Add Mark" button. Get started with Moderator Register for a free account at (You will not be required to use your email address in your account.) Use Moderator for community discussions If you're using Moderator for a blog, community, or another type of space where people comment on content, you can assign users to specific moderating roles. Moderators can use their specific roles to manage the type of discussion that is being held. For example, moderators can enforce commenting rules, moderate what type of content is allowed, or decide when it's appropriate to delete content. Here's how to set up moderating roles for Moderator: You can assign moderating roles to any number of users in Moderator. For example, you could assign one moderator role for content to multiple users, or you could assign two moderators roles to a single user, one to decide when content should be allowed and one to decide
