Portable deployment means minimal fuss, quick handling, and in the end, effective processing. The application is provided as a portable package, which means that those who enjoy working “on-the-fly” will appreciate the offering. The main working principle behind the app will, however, require you to be at least a bit organized. What that means, is that the application will provide the outputted files automatically, in the same directory where the executable is located. This isn’t such a big gripe if you’re processing a single file, but when working with multiple images, it is best to move it to a dedicated folder, for a tidier operation. Just drag-and-drop the required image onto the application’s corresponding executable and you’re done. One of the best features provided by the app is the fact that it allows users to just drag-and-drop the images onto the executable, and it will automatically yield the corresponding output files. This is simple and comfortable, but unfortunately, there is no batch processing capability. The conversion process will basically scale the added image to a 128 by 128 pixel resolution, adjust file size to 16 KB, and the color gamut to 256 colors. Which are all, the required characteristics for the Dahua “Picture Overlay” feature.
