Technical Field This invention relates to personal hygiene and more particularly to a disposable cleaning unit for cleaning underarm and genital areas of a human. 2. Description of the Prior Art Disposable cleaning products have become increasingly popular for hygienic and economic reasons. Disposable products have replaced reusable ones in many applications. When considering the frequency of use of a product, the costs associated with the use of a product, as well as the desire to have a comfortable use experience, the disposable type of product is typically preferred. Disposable cleaning products include individual pre-moistened towelettes, individual cleansing wipes and wipes contained in a single roll. For convenience in use, the rolled wipes are typically dispensed one at a time. While disposable products are convenient, a separate pre-moistened towelette is typically required for use and should be dispensed separately. To use a towelette, a user must wet the towelette before use. The towelette is then used on a body part and discarded. This can be a waste of the product. Pre-moistened wipes are easy to use. To use the wipes, a user simply peels back a section of the single roll and applies the wipes to a body part. Unfortunately, single roll disposable wipes have not enjoyed great commercial success. The individual wipes are often torn from the roll, leaving the remaining wipes in the roll unusable. In addition, the use of pre-moistened wipes does not provide the convenience of a single use disposable product. Single roll wipes are typically used by dispensing the wipe in a generally circular pattern around a body part. Because the rolls of wipes are typically non-circular in shape, dispensing a single roll of wipes can cause difficulty to the user. The user must reposition the roll or stand it on end to achieve the desired dispensing pattern. Rolls of wipes can also be easily contaminated. When dispensing a roll of wipes, an individual wipe often loses its position within the roll. As a result, the end of the roll is
