Microsoft is planning to bring an updated Office suite for the PC with improved features such as better support for power users. Microsoft will deliver Office for Windows 8, the successor to Windows 7, as a tablet-optimized version, although the PC version will be powered by Windows 8. The company plans to include support for iPad in the operating system at launch, and the company will also release a touch-optimized version of Office for the tablet, company officials said. Windows 8 is expected to be available for consumers as early as late this year or early 2013. Microsoft's plans to re-enter the tablet space comes after its failure to make headway in that sector last year. Tablets and PCs have been a continuous fight for space. In fact, only one in ten personal computers sold in 2011 was a tablet, according to the IDC. Microsoft's plan to debut the new touch-optimized Office for tablets comes just as rival Google is planning to debut a touch-optimized version of its own Google Docs suite. If Google succeeds, the landscape for Office as a desktop PC product could be changed. Google is due to launch a free version of its new Google Docs mobile app at the end of the month, giving users the ability to view and edit documents on a range of different devices. "Android has a great appeal in the developing markets. With its strong UI and openness, it is much easier to write and run a mobile application on Android than iPhone," said Chong

Zhang, co-founder and CTO at Qooine, a mobile app startup that is building a mobile app for mobile search. Google is offering a 14-day free trial of Google Docs to users of the Android Market, and has promised to add more features to its new mobile app over the coming months. "I think Google Docs will improve, and will have the future of Google Docs," said Zhang. Microsoft's plans to release a touch-optimized version of Office suite and its tablet strategy could be the first time the company has made significant changes to its desktop products. The company faces stiff competition from the iPad which has been a strong player in the market since its launch, with the tablet making up more than 11 percent of all
