6.27.2006 They're rude. There's that whole group of people that doesn't care what you think. They've got something to say and it isn't going to be influenced by any sort of etiquette. They're rude, usually from a distance, usually as they're leaving a store or movie (as opposed to walking into a movie or store and hanging around). In those instances, they're not even going to make eye contact and they seem to have an expectation of privacy. "Don't bother me. I'm on my way home from work. Don't bother me." They don't even do that in public as they're walking - they pause to say a few words at a gas station in the middle of the day, not in a school, grocery store, movie theater or restaurant. On the other hand, they are courteous and fair. They're just not interested in idle chit chat. They share opinions but not a lot of conversation. They're just there to do their thing - whatever it is - and if you want to join

Q: Can't access WPA protected Wi-Fi from OS X I have installed OS X on a MacBook Pro with a BCM43227 WiFi card. I am in the process of transferring my old wireless network from a PC to the Mac and can't get the Mac to connect to the old network. The network is WPA protected, and the password works on the PC. I've tried to connect directly to the router through the Mac's Wi-Fi settings, and through the WiFi Preferences application. Neither method gives me any options to connect to the old network. I have a version of Mac OS X 10.8.2. Is there something I'm missing?

A: I'm using a MacBook Pro with a BCM43226 WiFi card and I'm successfully connecting to a WPA-secured network using WPA2 Personal. Open the network connection panel (available from the Wi-Fi icon in the menu bar) and click on the Wi-Fi network you want to connect to. Press the Wi-Fi menu button and select Configure WPA/WPA2 Personal. You'll be prompted for your Wi-Fi password, which you enter. You'll be connected to the protected network. You can disconnect and connect at any time. If you go to the Wi-Fi menu and select Connect Automatically, you can turn off the feature that starts the password prompt automatically on your next login, or you can specify a time limit after which you must enter your Wi-Fi password before connecting to your Wi-Fi network. You can also configure the Mac to connect
