The relative roles of sensory information and age in the formation of face categories. The acquisition of knowledge of the human face is dependent on numerous sensory cues. However, it is not known which types of sensory information are most important for the early formation of face categories. Using a dot-probe task with a new set of young children, we tested whether sensory information obtained in V2 and V4 could bias the formation of face categories and if early experience with faces was a prerequisite for the influence of V2 and V4. We found that V2 and V4 contribute to face-category learning. First, familiar faces and familiar morphs of familiar faces were more rapidly detected than novel faces and novel morphs of familiar faces. Second, when probes were presented in V2 and V4, the bias for familiar faces and morphs of familiar faces was reduced compared with that in a control location, and visual experience with faces was a prerequisite for this effect. The results indicate that face-category formation is not biased by V2 and V4 alone, but early experience with faces must occur for this category learning to take place. Our findings have implications for how we understand face recognition in infancy and may offer new insights into the neural basis of face-category formation in adults.
