Heterogeneity in the biology of human melanoma cells. A major concern in anticancer research is whether a specific drug or therapy will be effective for all patients with a particular cancer. There is no doubt that melanoma is a heterogeneous cancer, but we lack an adequate understanding of how heterogeneity translates into differences in tumor biology. Biomarkers for tumor heterogeneity and differences in response to therapy have not yet been well explored, but studies of tumor heterogeneity can provide insights into the biology of melanoma and may suggest specific drug candidates that will be effective for all patients with melanoma. In the past few years, it has become evident that melanoma, like many other cancers, is comprised of a spectrum of cells from varying states of differentiation and growth characteristics. We have learned much about the biology
