For 3D animation, all frames must be rendered after the simulation is complete. For 2D vector animation, the rendering process is an illustration of a keyframe. Any type of animation can be used to create animation, but mostly for animating 3D models. However, 3D models can also be used for 2D animation if the software engine allows it. Usually animations are built according to the following principle: 1. Creating a main frame and setting it as a key frame. 2. Creation of all other frames, for each scene, using the same key frame. 3. Combining all frames into the final one to create animation. 4.
