Researchers have known for decades that viruses can attack bacteria. (There are many viruses that turn off genes in bacteria, and infection with such viruses can even kill a bacterial cell.) But researchers have also known for decades that bacteria attack viruses. The viruses called bacteriophages infect bacteria, changing their structures and growth rates; to survive, the bacteria must first fend off their phages and then evolve mechanisms to prevent more phages from entering. In a new study, published in the April 29 issue of Cell, researchers from the University of Pittsburgh and Harvard University have determined precisely what these phage-bacterial antagonism processes are. "We've been taking a deceptively simple system and trying to understand the mechanisms that would underlie more complex phenomena," says lead author David R. Enoch, assistant professor of microbial pathogenesis at Pitt. "Many species make antagonistic relationships with each other and many antibiotics are made from chemicals that evolved in defensive chemicals of such antagonistic interactions." "We've figured out the 'plumbing' that phages use to make their own environment in the bacterial cell," Enoch says. "It's fairly intuitive how phages make the most energy-efficient way to make their environment, but we haven't really tackled the more complex question of how bacteria do this or how they win or lose." The mechanisms of phage-bacterial antagonism are a bit like the plumbing of a house - when a house is built, you start with the basic functionality of a door opening, faucets, sinks, heat and air conditioning, and then you start adding details like windows, baths and sinks to have the subtle functions of the house. "The early phage-bacteria antagonism worked by one phage binding to a bacterium, while another phage can bind to the same receptor," Enoch says. "If either phage couldn't do this, then the bacterium would also be infected." But

Crescentic glomerulonephritis is an uncommon lesion that can complicate a variety of glomerular diseases. It is a serious condition that can be fatal. We describe a case of crescentic glomerulonephritis associated with bacteriuria in a patient with systemic lupus erythematosus that led to dialysis in the acute phase and a kidney transplant in the quiescent phase. Bacteriuria in a lupus patient can be associated with a number of diseases and be confused with a urinary tract infection (UTI). In order to reach a definitive diagnosis and guide the therapeutic approach, it is crucial to consider this possibility in the absence of a response to antibiotic therapy. The underlying cause, however, is not always easily recognized, especially in the context of systemic lupus erythematosus, which is a disease that often clinically mimics UTI.In a move one can only describe as ♦ 3e33713323
