The mock must be added to the project's Test-driven Development(TDD) folder, which is in the project's Visual Studio root. The tool is separate from the framework and can be installed alongside the framework. Development teams use Mocks to make sure their applications integrate correctly. You can use them to fake requests to remote services or to authenticate users. For example, you could test a Service object by creating a mock instance of an HttpClient that returns different status codes to the Service's requests, or you could use a fake Authenticator that returns credentials that don't match the actual user. The team often makes several mock objects for each kind of service in its application. A mock object is called a fake when it uses multiple different 6a5afdab4c
