Vocalizations are a major function of laryngeal neuromuscular disease. These vocalizations have been studied in several forms of amyotrophic lateral sclerosis (ALS) and they are frequent in patients with bulbar and hypobulbar forms of the disease, but their description is not uniform. The aim of the present study was to describe the frequency, severity, distribution and content of vocalizations in rats with a model of ALS. The following were recorded: voice amplitude and frequency, quantification of vocalizations over a 2-h period, their distribution and content in different segments of the vocal tract. It was observed that vocalizations in ALS rats remained of the same intensity as in controls, but the frequency of calls per minute and the intervals between calls increased significantly. The distribution of vocalizations throughout the vocal tract showed a significant displacement to the front in the ALS rats. In the control group the frequency of vocalizations per minute and the intervals between calls remained similar in the different segments of the
